Staying power

A year after Hurricane Irma, luxury resorts on the Caribbean island of Anguilla have reopened with fresh experiences and sublime transformations

The 16-mile-long island of Anguilla boasts a thriving music scene, a smattering of tony resorts and dozens of white-sand beaches kissed by bluer-than-blue waters. “It’s the kind of place you have to see to believe,” says Deb Vos of Tradition Sailing Charters, which offers snorkeling excursions and cruises.

The island is in the midst of a renaissance following Hurricane Irma’s devastation in 2017. Each of Anguilla’s luxury resorts reopened this season with modern makeovers, attracting both first-time visitors and Caribbean connoisseurs long familiar with the destination’s laid-back appeal.

At the 91-room, Mediterranean-inspired

CuisinArt Golf Resort & Spa, the lobby bar and pool area have been reimagined as an open-air sanctuary. There’s also a splashy new playground for children, and the property’s signature Santorini restaurant was relocated to the clubhouse of the resort’s 18-hole golf course (the only one on the island).

Meanwhile, Rottet Studio redesigned the 108 rooms at Belmond Cap Juluca with breezy beach-chic touches complementing the Greco-Moorish architecture. An all-new oceanfront infinity-edge pool provides unrivaled views of Anguilla’s turquoise waters, and the Cip’s by Cipriani restaurant and casual Cap Shack offer guests fresh gastronomic experiences.

And the 181-room Four Seasons Resort and Residences—perched above the spectacular Meads Bay—has expanded its ocean terrace and added floating bars to the pool area (now, bathers can enjoy a fresh rum punch without interruption). Four Seasons also introduced a culinary program allowing guests to meet with local fishermen to select their dinner. —DERRIK J. LANG
